Virginia has developed a comprehensive plan to address re-entry and recidivism reduction for state inmates; however, local correctional facilities were left with little guidance or resources. Because of the autonomy of local jails, there has been no state-led or funded re-entry service, and localities cannot participate in the state Department of Corrections' programs. This program is designed to address that gap.

The problems that lead to crime and a jail sentence, such as abuse, trauma, anger management or addiction, are usually still present in offenders' lives even after they serve their sentence. It's important to address these in planning for a successful re-entry.

Services offered, both prior to their release and immediately after, include:

- individualized case management,
- treatment services,
- opportunities to develop work skills,
- support networks.

The Office of the Attorney General is addressing this gap in resources and coordination in the criminal justice system for the first time by offering local sheriff's our assistance in providing these services.

The Office of the Attorney General has collected data and materials to create an online tool that will represent the best practices in the re-entry field, with examples of efforts around Virginia.
